

A lot of members panicked over the latest news in AUS regarding Blockchain Global. This has been going on for awhile ever since the exchange ACX failed. Details of that failure is not our business, since ACX was not an entity under HyperTech Group, and there is no accusation of wrong doing by HyperTech Group, Sam or Ryan, or even Blockchain Global.

The "in the news" part of this came about when a group of former clients of ACX banded together and decided to go after ANY entity even remotely connected to ACX in an effort to recoup lost crypto. That is their right of course. However, Blockchain Global is not responsible for the failure of ACX, any more than HyperTech Group would be. Sam has cooperated fully with all authorities in the process of finding a solution, of course.

One final point you may want to mention but are not obligated to. Blockchain Global (as many of the hundreds of entities under the umbrella of HyperTech Group empire) does not just have one registered entity. The one registered in AUS is not "the whole thing" or the international entity we know as Blockchain Global and as one of the strongest pillars of the HyperTech Group. Because of the way it is structured, at no time does any of this action in AUS (even if, for instance, the courts were to decide to liquidate BG in Australia to bail out a failed exchange, which I cannot imagine happening as they did not own the exchange...) negatively impact the entirety of Blockchain Global, HyperTech Group, or HyperFund.

Thank you again for your efforts to help reassure members. Many members have been through some negative experiences with other "programs", and their tendency is to go straight to DOOM if anything looks imperfect. As you know, any giant business empire encounters ups and downs, and part of why HyperTech Group is so strong is because of the way it is decentralized.
